

Dynasty Chronicle

“A Subjective Voice in Unprecedentedly Objective Times”

Exclusively Serving the Encinitas Dynasty at the Request of the Commissioner

All information tirelessly vetted by underpaid professionals with the frequent exception that said information is entertaining and/or contributes to the intended narrative arc of the author(s). Chronicle Corp reserves the right to publish whatever the hell they desire and herein declares that no responsibility will be taken for what is published in this, or any, issue of this publication.

2022 Season Recap

Regular Season Recap

Analysts dubbing 2022 “Year of the Boring Domesticated Guy”

By Drew Gilmore, Editor-in-Chief

Drew Gilmore puts a lot of thought into this worthless document.

As the 2022 ED Playoffs begin, we look back on the regular season to reflect, learn, live, laugh, and love. This season certainly did not disappoint; it had all the exciting elements of a fantasy sports season, namely dissatisfaction, blame-shifting, senseless argument, and the general feeling of superiority to dozens of professional NFL coaches who clearly don’t understand (despite years of experience and millions of dollars in compensation) how to properly utilize a raw talent like your RB3. Though some owners are taking comfort in recent publications from a fringe Baptist cult that draw upon imagery from the book of Daniel to predict a forthcoming year when everything will pan out exactly as expected for fantasy football (many remain skeptical of the theory due to its contingency on a highly unlikely series of consecutive blood moons), we know that fantasy football requires one to unexpectedly expect the expectedly unexpected.

An Academic Approach to Understanding Success

The ED was once up in flames over the foul play of a man who abandoned the league for the sake of his household—a household many associated with said member’s incompetence in managing his team—but new studies are suggesting league members should stop and reconsider these outdated ideas. Prominent fantasy football think tank The Chester Institute has published a series of shocking findings asserting a positive correlation between having children and succeeding in the ED.

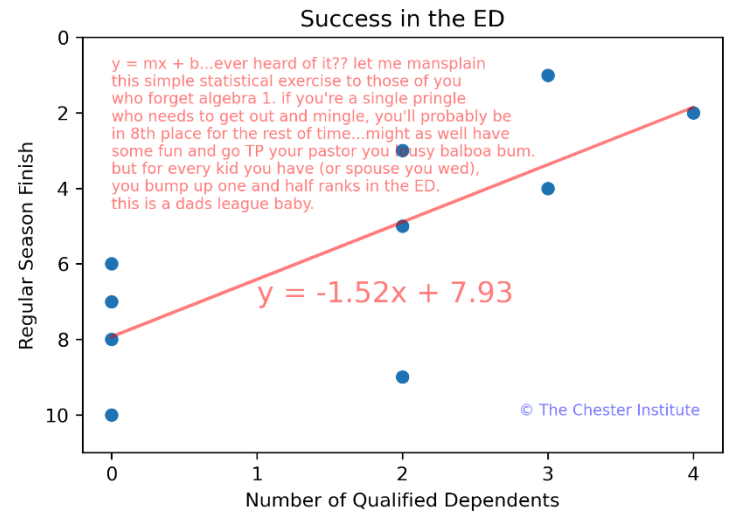

Figure 1: The Chester Institute's findings turned heads, but none more than the above graph.

Many academics have disputed the validity of Chester’s findings citing a horrendously inadequate sample size and drawing attention to the conspicuous omission of every other year of data. Rick Dangerfield, a distinguished senior fellow at The Chester Institute (who notably was rumored to be at the center of the WGA union scandal that led to the shadow campaign to oust Matthew Berry from ESPN*) was asked to expand on the statistical liberties taken when conducting research for the paper during a recent appearance on the popular podcast Two Beags

Details surrounding Matthew Berry’s “departure” from ESPN have been disputed by rival publications. The Chronicle maintains its reported narrative on the foundation of credible witnesses and informants*

Noteworthy Headlines

President Biden Poised to Sign Momentous Bill Intended to Stimulate ED Waiver Wire

“Come on man! These free agents stink! Every hardworking ED household will have access to a Jay Ajayi-equivalent by Week 12 of 2030” -POTUS

Chronicle Diversifies Advisory Board by Bringing in Japanese-made Genderless Dancing Robot Named Goosho

Gilmore noted “It’s imperative that we speak truth to power in every context and man does this thing know how to get down.”

Mission Church to Excommunicate Cal Roberts for Sports Gambling Racket Disguised as Dave Ramsey’s “Financial Peace University” Cohort

Roberts promised hefty winnings from “radical” parlays to church members with awful financial habits and crippling credit-card debt

Menard’s Secret to Success in the Ads Business? “Listening to Marcus talk about all the dumb stuff he buys online”

O’Keefe supposedly at forefront of lobbying efforts for FAAB reform

Opinion: A House Divided

Ideological differences re: “tanking” have potential to create ED’s first political parties, experts say

The practice of “tanking”—a term used to gentrify the reality of getting your ass kicked under the guise of purpose and strategy—has been the debate du jour for members of the ED. The argument has mostly focused on the potential punishment of certain tanking strategies due to their negative image. Experts have taken note as these types of disagreements amongst smaller, tight-knit communities tend to be a breeding ground from which political identities sprout from. Though opinions pertaining to the details vary, the expectation has long stood that the ED will eventually split into two major parties. There have been a handful of noteworthy events that many thought would initiate said division. There were the Reset Riots of the late 2010’s, the rumors of the formation of the Dynasty Denier Party, the “Go Half PPR, Go Broke” campaign, and even recently there have been murmurs of a roster reduction lobbying effort that is expected to draw fierce opposition in the coming offseason. At the end of the day, these issues only go so far as to demonstrate that the politics of the ED mirror the politics we see on the world stage in that those who have much are striving to maintain the status quo, while those who lack are more likely to support changes that offer upside for their franchises.

What makes the tanking situation unique is that it forces the ED to reckon with its own identity as a league. There is no doubt that the death of the sacko brought the league into a state of identity crisis. What the league perhaps did not consider enough was the accountability the sacko brought to the regular season. The shadow of the sacko loomed so large—was so dark and damp—that it kept you honest and sharp until Christmas, even if your team was abysmal. The sacko was the true and greater Gotham villain, who used chaos and shame to unmask the league’s most pathetic fool—a fool so undone by his misfortune in fantasy that he couldn’t even escape the clutches of defeat with one lucky week when he needed it most.

By Drew Gilmore, Editor-in-Chief
Drew Gilmore didn’t even get a degree in journalism.

Get to Know the ED: Marcus Rethwisch

Chronicle: How did you get into fantasy football and what do you like about it?

Rethwisch: I don’t remember how I got into the first league I’ve ever done but I do know that I did it cus my friends did.

C: Who is your favorite player you’ve ever owned in fantasy and why?

R: I picked up Jonathan Stewart in 2017 and he was pivotal in my very first championship run in the ED

C: What role do you play in the ED ecosystem?

R: I’m the villain. Everyone loves to hate me. I am always in the midst of legendary scandal and I think it’s good for the league for someone to wear the target.

C: How do you think the rest of the league perceives you?

R: See #3

C: Who do you consider your biggest rival in the ED?

R: Cal. He runs his team and conducts himself the complete opposite as I do and he has success relative to the rest of the league.

C: What is the ED’s greatest strength and weakness?

R: Biggest strength: relationships. This season especially, we turned a corner and really rally around each other and it’s rad. Biggest weakness: the slack. This also is a strength though