CHRONICLE EXCLUSIVE:

Details of Attempted Bribe by Rethwisch to Squash AmpGate

As if all the recent controversy was not enough to satiate the wicked appetites of Encinitas Dynasty beat writers and critics, the most recent details emerging from the swamp gas of AmpGate are proving to be the most intriguing. The plot thickened when local singer-songwriter Nathan Menard told a close friend about his alleged correspondence with Marcus Rethwisch in the days leading up to Rethwisch’s sentencing. The friend of Menard’s (who asked to remain anonymous) told the Chronicle that Menard had received communication from Rethwisch following Menard’s appointment to be bailiff of the ED court. Rethwisch allegedly made a request to Menard to obtain the bass amp in question and return it to Rethwisch for an unknown (believed to be significant) sum of money. It was insinuated from the request that Rethwisch would present said amp during his trial as de facto proof of his innocence. The source did not disclose whether or not Jordan Menard, Rethwisch’s legal counsel and older brother of Nathan Menard, was aware of this communication, but was suspicious of the links that bind the three parties involved. Despite the attempt, Menard chose the road less-traveled and walked hand-in-hand with justice as he denied Rethwisch’s request in order to uphold the integrity of the court.

Get to Know the ED: Mason Burns

In the first installment of this segment, the Chronicle interviewed Mason Burns, the original member of the Encinitas Dynasty. Before becoming the San Marcos Emperors, he went under the pseudonyms “Shottenheimer’s Balls”, “Marty’s Balls”, “Orphans of San Diego”, “Prosperity Ball”, and “Leucadia Emperors”.

Chronicle: How did you get into fantasy football and what do you like about it?

Burns: I was always a pure Chargers guy. I didn’t want anything getting in the way of rooting for them . But once I finally joined a league I was hooked. I like fantasy for the camaraderie.

Chronicle: Who is your favorite player you’ve ever owned in fantasy and why?

Burns: Andre Johnson because he beat up Cortland Finnegan and I definitely had him on my team far into his performance decline.

Chronicle: What role do you play in the ED ecosystem?

Burns: I like to bring the perspective of the common man. The man who doesn’t get too far into the weeds with statistics and paying for fantasy resources. The man who’s in it for the boys and maybe one day, by the hand of God, will win it all.

Chronicle: How do you think the rest of the league perceives you?

Burns: As a steady manager, but one who isn’t going to do anything you weren’t expecting. Not much of a threat but isn’t going to go full retard.

Chronicle: Who do you consider your biggest rival in the ED?

Burns: I love beating Cal the most so him.

Chronicle: What is the ED’s greatest strength and weakness?

Burns: Greatest strength is the rich ED story that continues to unfold. Greatest weakness was that we were stupid enough to get poled by Todd. The ED future is bright.
