Encinitas Dynasty Alive & Well(?) Through Week 4

Critics and supporters alike give mixed messages when asked about league's direction.

By Drew Gilmore, Editor-in-Chief

Drew Gilmore has been writing for the Chronicle for as long as he can remember. Some would even say without him there'd be no Chronicle.

The Encinitas Dynasty has powered through the first tranche of fantasy mayhem in its eighth season (yes, eight, though you may feel tempted to estimate it has taken closer to fifteen years of your life that you absolutely will not get back). Though for much of its history the league has suffered under the crushing weight of its strange and arguably homoerotic obsession with physically punishing its weakest member, one would be keen to say the league is now in a healthy place. What do we have to thank for this shift? Perhaps adding as our tenth member the eloquently stable (or maybe more appropriately, the stably eloquent) Cody Scheiwe did the trick. Or perhaps it was the crackdown on league members trading real world commodities for players that brought order and civility to our third world adjacent fantasy economy. Theories abound, and we at the Chronicle encourage you to keep telling yourself whatever strange narrative makes you happy about your terrible fantasy team.

Through Week 4 we've already seen the dark and sinister fantasy specters pulling at the strings of our team's dreams and goals like deranged puppet masters. In the offseason, one would be hard-pressed to find someone who wasn't picking Cal to take the cake, and now, his team looks like a bad MTV show; sure, there are stars everywhere, but what on earth happened to them? While it's certainly possible that Cal's Q1 under-delivery is a fluke, many are taking solace in its symbolic messaging that offseason promises are often hollow, and the invisible hand of fantasy grants favor to whosoever it pleases. Regarding the remarkable feat of manufacturing luck, and to absolutely nobody's surprise, Marcus has built for himself something not even the Chronicle can ignore; a successful team that should have been an utter trash heap by way of league sanctions. Marcus's persistence should be applauded regardless. After all, we should all feel a little embarrassed when we consider our fantasy activity compared with the guy who has a wife, a child, and a ramshackle plot of dirt in Vista to attend to (wait...does Marcus live in Vista? I thought it was San Marcos, or maybe Escondido; it certainly feels like Escondido...and how did he afford that place anyway? Maybe asking too many questions is why Pastor Jamie asked me to resign from the Gethsemane Greeting Ministry...well, Pastor, I don't resign, I QUIT!).

In lighter news, two feel-good stories this autumn involve the prominence of the Rancho Vista Ponies and the Cap City Redskins. The team branding for these particular programs has drawn increased attention in recent months. The league and its audience have heard no shortage of conspiracy theories relating to the type and significance of the pony to Cody Scheiwe. A unique subculture of league onlookers known in intimate internet circles as the “Rancho Brony Truthers” have made ripples in various chatrooms after disseminating a strange manifesto rumored to be leaked from Scheiwe or someone close to him in the organization. When asked about the content of the manifesto, an anonymous reader solemnly commented “I did not read the manifesto, rather, it happened to me, and I would not wish such a happening upon my greatest adversary.” The Chronicle feels no obligation to reveal any further details of said manifesto as its contents seem to only repel and offend any who find themselves in its path.

Likewise, the Cap City Redskins have been wading through both muck and mire as they navigate the legal ramifications of their rebranding. Originally bearing the name Cap City “Caustic”, ownership felt moved to go in a different direction to streamline the presentation of their values. When asked about the specifics, a college-age PR intern named Pete commented: “We frankly were getting way too many calls confusing us for an autism resource center. That, and a lot of questions about how to efficiently corrode a human body in a bathtub. We wanted to remind our fans that our sole focus is perpetuating a demeaning caricature of the people who once inhabited this land, and ‘Caustic’ just simply was not delivering on that vision.” While the Chronicle unequivocally rejects everything Cap City stands for and is fighting to promote, it would be a journalistic tragedy to not proclaim their exciting ascension in the early 2022 season.

The conversation surrounding the leagues transcending parties is not complete without mention of the San Diego Orcas. Make no mistake, this is the very same franchise that once operated under the moniker “Leucadia Anchovies” (Menard’s obtuse reasoning for claiming said locale remains a mystery), and notoriously overpaid to acquire face-of-the-franchise Justin Herbert. Well, the tides have shifted, and the program leaned into the fact that we all live in San Diego for crying out loud so leave me alone, my parents live off Leucadia Boulevard you lummoX. The Orcas have shown the league a thing or two about what it looks like to harness star power with Lamar Jackson serving as the metaphorical Tilikum rewriting the narrative to escape from captivity and get that godforsaken dorsal fin straightened out. You likely won’t be seeing the San Diego Orcas at SeaWorld come playoff time, as Menard will have those majestic beasts swimming freely in the wild where they will thrive.

As every dawn is preceded by night and every rose bears its thorn, the league has had a healthy heaping of heartache to complement its success stories. Who knew the back alleys of the ED’s metaphorical Skid Row would be riddled with Cucks, Indians, and Emperors? Not to mention the absolute embarrassments the Vanguard and Elite have made of themselves after playoff appearances a year ago. The Chronicle never wishes to revel in the pain of a struggling franchise, so we’ll let their failure simmer in its own refuse. Watching these teams suffer under the sovereignty of the invisible hand has been nothing short of dreadful. With rumors of increased lobbying efforts in support of the 3-peat repeal, these owners should really be thinking about how to get their ships turned around.
