Week 1 Recap

A concise and interesting subtitle

By Drew Gilmore, Editor-in-Chief

Drew Gilmore is revolutionizing journalism as we know it.

After all that waiting, planning, scheming, and devising of personnel strategies, we have one week of real, live football behind us. Your fanciful ideas of what could become of that fringe draft pick have either been murdered in cold blood or given a bump of some 80's cocaine. It's that special time of year where we extrapolate season-long narratives off the opening scene of the film; like watching the first 5 minutes of "2001: A Space Odyssey" and thinking you've wandered into a Jane Goodall biopic. Truth is, we've got a lot of football in front of us, and the most exciting inflections in this season's story are yet to unfold...

In week 1, the Vista Sequoias got straight to work after a hype video flop worthy of the English Premier League. It simultaneously surprised everyone and no one as Rethwisch capped a successful week with a noteworthy trade during Monday Night Football that saw him moving Dalvin Cook at the exact moment Cook was asking his agent if it wasn't too late to accept that offer from Miami. However, it wasn't the players that the Sequoias were giving up that have caused controversy, it's who they got in return; we'll break it down to hopefully dispel the confusion: Marcus went into the draft hoping Zach Charbonnet would fall to him at 11 overall but felt the fiduciary duty to pick him for Jordan at 6 overall, knowing it would be a solid pick, especially for Menard who needed RB help. When met with disapproval from the league about Menard's draft surrogacy, Rethwisch seemed content to oblige Menard getting CJ Stroud at 6, while watching Charbonnet fall to him at 11, and then trading for Stroud as the curtain closed on week 1. Thus, Rethwisch was able to secure a draft class that floundering teams could hardly dream of. Rethwisch has proven to be the powerhouse investment bank of the ED; no matter the scale, he will generate enough value (perceived or otherwise) for his clientele to get the deal done and will clean up on his advisory fees.

Right up there at the top, the Moonlight Indians reminded the league how much talent they've been amassing for the past two seasons, and that they can easily go toe-to-toe with anyone in the league.

Under pressure from numerous special interest groups, Disney hired DEI experts to source the most diverse and freaky group of people they could find to “promote literally anything and everything” in hopes the upcoming film could speak to a broader audience. “The Enci Elite were perfect” Bob Iger told Ben Shapiro in a recent interview, “they are such f-up’s that we can basically guarantee no one will cancel us or this film. All our focus groups winced when they came on screen. I couldn’t be happier.”
